The Japanese way helps demonstrate that creativity does not have to be spontaneous and unplanned; it can become a discipline that we can learn and develop to use at will.

Many organisations have expressed to me the notion that they have too many new ideas.

If we combine these almost opposite habits of mind, will it weaken both of them?

More recently they have been automating processes using computer systems, itself an intrinsically logical technology.

Soundbite: Get out of your comfort zone!

In the future, the value that western economies can add will come from right-brained thinking.

So there are advantages and drawbacks when it comes to the separation of thinking into defined and stated modes.

It's Christmas soon and everyone is very excited.

What do you do to create this attitude within the organisation?

Soundbite: T'is the season to be jolly!

In the early days the going was quite tough and we needed to make symbolic gestures to demonstrate that we were serious.

The difference was that during the week I had not so much learned how to draw, but more that I had learned how to see.

Some ideas to get you started.

Do you have a vision of what is possible?

As a result, dyslexic people tend to be more right-brained.
